Conducting interviews: Like/Dislike Method

- The simplest approach that proves reasonably effective in practice is to interview customers as they use the product. During the interview, a team member asks the customer to describe what they like and do not like about the product at their site of usage.
- During this process, more detailed questions may be asked to explore different facets of the product.
- At the same time, a research mind is developed. It is important when holding interviews to have the customers talk through their process of using the product.

Basic methods: Information gathering and brainstorming

- Concept generation is the divergent development of many alternatives, where the focus is on innovation, structural layout and function satisfaction.
- Formal concept generation methods may be classified broadly as:
  - Intuitive and Directed / logical

Traditional Brainstorming

- It is an intuitive method of generating concepts, it focuses on product function and architecture, where team members communicate ideas verbally during a set time period.
- All team members are encouraged to be open and stimulated during the initial sessions of brainstorming.
- There is no need to strictly adhere to product specifications, but instead to focus on the functional needs of a product.
- The overall aim of brainstorming is to obtain several concepts that might work as solution principles to a piece of the design problem.

Pugh Charts

- The Pugh chart evaluation scheme presented earlier involves sets of alternatives, sets of criteria and a better/same/worse evaluation against a datum.
- With the set of alternatives and criteria, there are three basic mathematical tasks that are to be completed

Afternoon Session:

Timing: 1:30 pm to 4:30 pm
